Graduate Profile

Sean Murphy, PhD candidate, Indiana University

Ireland's (especially Dublin's) rich literary history made it the ideal environment to work in. Whether it was in my flat or in the café, the pub, the library, the coast or the Wicklow hills, I always felt myself immersed in a swell of passionate humanists and explorers of ideas. I was surrounded by individuals who really cared about writing on and researching the depths of the human condition. What I liked most about UCD was the faculty in the School of Philosophy, and my fellow graduate students. The professors were all visibly interested in the success of their students. This was especially evident in my relationships with Brian O'Connor and Jim O'Shea. They both instilled in me the confidence that it takes to move on in philosophy, as I am now doing, as I prepare to begin my doctorate at Indiana University, a top-25 Philosophy programme in the US.
