MA American Studies (One Year Full Time)

This is the first graduate programme in American Studies in Ireland. Because of the United States' unrivalled status in the world today, the debates on American values and the mission of American democracy have become a matter of global concern. This programme introduces students to advanced study of American culture and politics, in both domestic and international contexts. It is a multidisciplinary programme that promotes study of the interactions of cultural, social and political factors. It aims to deepen and widen students' knowledge of major topics and issues as well as to enable them to develop a significant measure of expertise in their chosen thesis subject. The programme affords opportunities to study the US across a range of disciplines – including history, literature, media and visual studies, politics and international relations – and to develop skills in analysis, critical thinking and primary research techniques.

Purpose-built institute for American Studies

Graduate Profile

Julie Farrell, Texas, Academic Communications and Marketing Manager

I wanted to study the culture, history, and political evolution of the United States from a European perspective, and because Ireland and the United States have a unique relationship, I felt that Dublin and UCD would be the perfect place for me to pursue this study. I had visited Ireland previously and, even as a tourist, I knew I would feel welcome and comfortable with Irish life if I moved there. Although Ireland is vastly different to the United States, it was an easy adjustment and fun experience. UCD is a lovely campus full of bright and inspiring professors, students and societies. I even had the opportunity to meet President Bill Clinton during my time at UCD. Shaking hands with one of my country's most influential and creative leaders was an incredible honour. For the past two years I have worked in academic communications and marketing for a university just outside New York. I use the research and writing skills I developed during my MA daily in my current job. I also occasionally teach a course on globalisation to undergraduate students, drawing upon the knowledge I gained on the topic during my studies at UCD.
